

I strongly believe that the FCC should not implement any regulation that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law. The impact of Indiana's law has been extremely positive in that it virtually eliminated all unwanted and unsolicited marketing telephone calls to my home. Because both my wife and myself work, it is important that we be able to share time at home without interruption by someone seeking to sell us something. These unsolicited calls invariably came during dinner or while we are putting our young son to bed; now we are able to spend uninterrupted time which my wife and I believe has enhanced our personal lives. Dilution of the Indiana law to a lower standard would be a significant step backward and would only serve to prove that the interests of businesses are being served in lieu of citizens.
